What is working

- The fictional author identity and broad genre are consistent.
- The official catalog groups books under the correct series.
- The primary series has a verified order and clear Book 1 starting point.

What could confuse a reader or leave your book out

- Reader-style mood and trope language is not repeated consistently.
- Romance, heat, standalone status, and content guidance need direct answers.
- Several fictional retailer records omit series numbers or point to older information.

Your three-fix action plan

1. Build one canonical Start Here page

Why: It resolves the largest group of partial and missing answers at once.

Done looks like: One approved page states the series order, best starting book, reader fit, and current links.

2. Add explicit reader-expectation answers

Why: AI should not have to infer tone, cliffhangers, romance, or content guidance.

Done looks like: Every high-value reader question has a plain, author-approved answer.

3. Retest and correct inconsistencies

Why: Publication is only the first step; the finished copy must be checked against the verified facts.

Done looks like: The same 15 questions produce more clear answers and no invented claims.

What we recommend doing first

Publish one canonical Books, Series Order, and Start Here page

Why this comes first: The strongest facts already exist, but they are scattered. One approved reference would answer order, entry point, reader fit, and current-edition questions in one place.

Your step-by-step instructions

1. Create a clear section for each included series with its official name and numbered book order.
2. Add a Best place to begin note plus mood, tropes, standalone status, romance level, and content guidance.
3. Link every title to the current edition and identify formats that are not yet available.
4. Use the approved page as the source when correcting retailer profiles and repeating the reader questions.

Before you begin

- Confirm the supplied series order and current editions.
- Approve the reader-fit, romance, and content statements before publication.

What improvement will look like: More questions should return a clear starting point, correct order, current edition, and dependable reader-fit answer.

Your three personalized Codex or Claude prompts

These are built from your actual pen name, books, series order, reader fit, report findings, and priority questions. Copy one complete prompt at a time.

Prompt 1 - Build the priority page

Create the complete Start Here and reading-order update.

Act as a careful website content editor for the fictional author Maribel Quillhaven. Create a website-ready Books, Series Order, and Start Here page for Hearthglass Harbor Mysteries. Use this verified order only: 1. The Scone That Knew Too Much, 2. Murder at the Moonlit Market, 3. A Teacup Full of Alibis. State that Book 1 is the best starting point, each central mystery resolves, and the magical-bakery and found-family threads continue in order. Add short sections for reader mood, gentle humor, puzzle-forward mysteries, romance expectations, formats, and content notes. Do not invent awards, reviews, heat levels, or story facts. Put every unsupported detail in a Questions for Maribel list instead of guessing.

Prompt 2 - Create consistent book-discovery copy

Connect the real titles to questions readers ask without knowing the series name.

Using only approved facts for Maribel Quillhaven and Hearthglass Harbor Mysteries, write: (a) a 155-character search description, (b) a 60-word series introduction, (c) one 35-word reader-fit statement for each of The Scone That Knew Too Much, Murder at the Moonlit Market, A Teacup Full of Alibis, and (d) six plain-language FAQ answers covering order, starting point, standalone status, cliffhangers, tone, and found family. Use the actual titles naturally. Preserve a warm, witty cozy-fantasy voice. Do not add facts that are not supplied; mark missing facts with [AUTHOR TO CONFIRM].

Prompt 3 - Check and retest the finished work

Catch errors and measure whether the update answers more reader questions.

Act as a fact-checker for Maribel Quillhaven. Compare the finished page with this verified order: The Scone That Knew Too Much; Murder at the Moonlit Market; A Teacup Full of Alibis. Return a table with columns Claim, Verified, Problem, and Exact correction. Flag invented credentials, unsupported content promises, broken links, missing series numbers, and inconsistent titles. Then test these five questions against the final copy: where should I start, what order do I read the series, does each mystery resolve, which book fits a gentle funny mood, and is found family central? Rate each answer Clear, Partial, or Missing and explain the rating.

How to check your work

After you publish the update, repeat the same questions. Improvement means more complete and correct answers—not a mysterious ranking or a promise of sales.

- Repeat every question in this report after the approved update.
- Compare Clear, Partial, and Missing totals with the baseline.
- Record incorrect titles, orders, editions, and reader promises separately.

Your DIY workflow

1. Begin with Prompt 1 in Codex or Claude and review the proposed priority update.
2. Review the proposed wording and approve only accurate facts.
3. Use Prompt 2 for consistent supporting copy, then Prompt 3 to check and retest the finished work.
